Black Sun Daniel Cross

It is the 908th year of the Post Renascentia calendar. At this time, mankind has expanded into the galaxy forming a great interstellar empire, one of the thirteen great civilizations that hold ultimate control of the galaxy. However, as a consequence of this expansion, piracy has since become rampant across the star ways. Many a renegade seek fortune within the various settled worlds and colonies or treasure convoys that move in between, all with little or no remorse for the means they employ to gain it.

Enter the Flint Brothers, Jonathan and Alexander. The two children of one of the most legendary pirates of all time, the Flints have but a meager existence unto themselves, barely surviving as "pirates for hire" with little hope of betterment. And then, after a series of strange events, the pair come to the attention of a newcomer, a mysterious woman of unknown race. Holding a strange fascination with the brothers, the woman hires them for a specific assignment: to capture a prototype warship, crew her and then utilize her toward their host's service. Having no viable alternative, the Flints accept her offer.

Soon however, the brothers, as well as those who they have taken into their new crew, learn that they are about to take on far more than they bargained for. Finding themselves entrapped in a strange expedition that will take them to the very reaches of the galaxy, facing obstacles and enemies from all sides as they continue forward toward their objective, their very survival and fortune will come down to not only their unique strengths and powers, but their very will to survive and prosper at any cost. All while a mysterious outsider watches over them, his own plans for the Flints and their matron about to go into effect...
