Wendy is a nineteen-year-old secretary working for a major data storage company on the East coast of the United States. She's a lowly programmer in a cubicle job. But she's caught the eye of someone on the top floor. He's interested in her and wants to add Wendy to his list of conquests.

Bentley is the owner of the company where Wendy works as a programmer. He's ventured down to the lower levels in the building and spotted a pretty young thing walking into an office. He's seduced four hundred and ninety-nine women. Bentley has decided Wendy will be number five hundred. He calls for Wendy's file from human resources and begins to plan his strategy. He's worth over a billion dollars, lives in a luxurious town house and is fifty years old. He doesn't anticipate much of a problem.

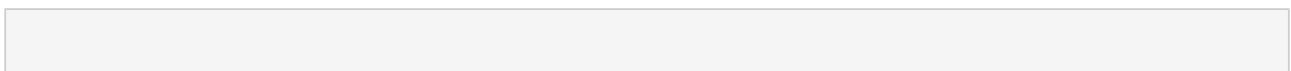

But Wendy has hired onto Bentley's company just because she wants him to attempt a seduction. Wendy has no intention of spending her life as working at a lousy job for little pay. She has Bentley in her sights and intends on using him for her own hot desires.

Bentley has just finished reading a private detective's report on Wendy. He realizes his conquest five hundred, the one which will establish him as a new Casanova, is every bit as ruthless as himself. The only question remains: does she know he knows that she knows?
