The Expression: The Weed (The Expression Trilogy Book 1) Ron Graeff

Two inmates newly released from California prisons are brought together by chance. Mandy Mauro admitted negligence, falling asleep while her two children drowned in the backyard pool. Dagger Drone pleaded guilty to mishandling rat poison that killed his wife. Once free, and given separate instructions by inmates they knew about how to find the place, they meet at a farmhouse in Iowa.

Willow Neal is searching for a woman who may have taken up residence in an Iowa farmhouse. The stranger she seeks is part of a scientific study, and the data from a routine medical exam is the last piece she needs to complete the work. She is about to knock when she hears a voice inside pleading for a child's life.

These are modern times. These are ancient times. The trilogy begins with the emergence of an odd new plant (The Weed), and the conception of a child. The child grows (The Flower), and embarks on a quest (The Garden).

Nature never stands still, but some changes go unnoticed, take hold and pull history forward until the physical and spiritual reach a nexus. What grows in that old garden when The Expression takes place? What does it have to do with "substantial equivalence" -- the Food and Drug Administration's rule for allowing a new food to market? You will end up asking: If we are what we eat, who is this person and what is she doing in a place like this?
